What the experts say about 'The Wheel of Fortune'

"At last we have an adventure worthy of the BBC Micro.... This game must now become a yardstick by which future adventures should be measured." Micro Adventurer

"Technically this game surpasses any I have seen for the BBC." Home Computing Weekly

"This has to be the adventure of 1984. It really is superb." Micronet 800

The Wheel of Fortune heralds a new generation of adventure games for the BBC computer. Using advanced data compaction we have been able to produce a full-scale adventure with 250 locations and a host of features never before seen on this computer:

- Full colour half-screen graphics for each of the 250 locations. These remain on screen with the scrolling text and both may be studied simultaneously. The pictures are drawn instantly.
- Sophisticated language and speech interpreters capable of accepting single or multiple commands up to 254 characters in length. Complex commands are phrased just as they would be spoken.
- Intelligent characters with varying moods, acting in real-time. The speech interpreter allows you to talk to them, to give them commands or information, or to ask them questions.
- Function keys may be set up from within the game.
- You may save a partially completed game on tape or disc using your own file name. As with all Epic games, the tape-save is very fast.

Game Setting

Whilst walking along a lonely country lane, you notice a strange object lying on the ground. It is the magical Wheel of Fortune. On spinning it you find yourself in a strange and mystical world full of dangers and valuable treasures, but the Wheel of Fortune has gone. Your task is to collect all the treasures and find the Wheel of Fortune to enable you to return to civilisation.

The game is played by typing ordinary English sentences into the computer, which responds by describing your surroundings using both text and graphics. The computer will tell you what is happening throughout the game.
